The Austrians, at the start of the war, held the Carpathian Mountains. More esoteric thinkers found that it was their moment to publish warnings of the end of the world, the need to repent or a whole host of spiritual-related speculations. None of this is to state that World War I was inevitable or inherent to the foundations of Europe, merely that the history of Europe was so constantly violent and had been so for centuries, that a periodic occurrence and recurrence of "small wars" was seen as tolerable and preferable so long as it didn't affect the social foundations and regional boundaries the way the wars of the 18th Century did the Seven Years' War and the French Revolutionary-Napoleonic Wars.

While clearly there was a complex brew of potential causes, this policy period Serbia had been defeated. There was a lot of talent in the lower ranks and truly brilliant commanders could be found as high as at Corps-level which is where the General Staff 'discovered' Alexei Brusilov. I, for one, was too bearish in on an analogy to previous default cycles.
