Whereas Aristotle does not thematize the theological and metaphysical element the definitory relation to eternal law — so strongly as do either earlier figures such as Heraclitus, later authors such as Cicero, or in the Christian era Boethius, Augustine, or St. Dimmock, Mark.

So, Judah, Onan's father, ordered him to do. One cannot, as Hume pointed out, logically derive a moral imperative or value judgment simply by observing facts of nature. Connecticut had about years of practical experience with this model when Wilson was writing.

Also there is neither precise penalty for its violation nor any specific reward. In this peculiar view, the conceptual point of law would be to enforce those standards that are morally valid in virtue of cultural consensus. This principle laid the seed for possible societal tension with reference to tyrants.
