Though the passages in question are all to be found in Carpine more or less exactly, the expression is condensed and the order changed. That none of the forms of the English version can be from the same hand which wrote the original is made patent by their glaring errors of translation, but the Cotton text asserts in the preface that it was made by Mandeville himself, and this assertion was till lately taken on trust by almost all modern historians of English literature. Articulations of space emanating from the professional classes entered into the intellectual mainstream with expanding rates of vernacular literacy and the dismantling of a bilingual diglossic society that privileged Latin. The book may contain facts and knowledge acquired by actual travels and residence in the East, at least in the section which treats of the Holy Land and the ways of getting thither, of Egypt, and in general of the Levant.
