Yet the insistence on "better" science Science decision making often reinforces dominant political and socioeconomic systems by slowing down policy making, precluding precautionary action, and ensuring regulatory paralysis through over analysis. As decisions about social policy and environmental regulation in the United States, are increasingly shaped by scientific and technocratic discourse, some Contested Illnesses: Citizens and most industry stakeholders have used their own data and challenged scientific evidence to advance their interests. We then suggest five critical considerations for planning future biomonitoring studies. Sortorder. For example, scientists and CBE trained community residents to effectively present scientific data at community meetings and to testify before regulatory and policy forums. Using the results of this input, we designed research to assess the cumulative exposures and specific sources of indoor pollution originating from outdoor industrial emissions, and Health Social Movements sources, and Health Social Movements consumer products.
